Close school buildings for rest of academic year, says Gov. Lee

by Marta W. Aldrich
Chattanooga Tennessee

Gov. Bill Lee said Wednesday that Tennessee school buildings should remain closed for the rest of the academic year due to the coronavirus pandemic.

He also announced plans to create a task force led by Education Commissioner Penny Schwinn to focus on the well-being of students during the public health crisis.

Lee's directive means the state's nearly 1 million public school students are expected to finish their classes this spring using distance learning methods that are mostly online, on paper, or on public radio and television.

The announcement was expected as coronavirus cases and deaths in Tennessee continue to grow and relatively few days are left in the academic year anyway. Each district sets its own academic calendar in Tennessee, and most end classes in mid-to late May.

Other governors are taking similar steps. On Tuesday, Mississippi Gov. Tate Reeves became the latest to extend his closure order for the rest of the school year. He also urged some school systems to consider offering summer classes to help students catch up.

All public school campuses in Tennessee have been shuttered since March 20 at the governor's urging, and districts have scrambled to launch remote learning programs and deliver meals for students from low-income families.

Last week, the State Board of Education passed emergency rules covering the likelihood that in-person classes would not resume this spring and guiding districts on issues such as calculating grades and graduating high school seniors. Under those rules, schools can't issue unexcused absences or report students as truant for failing to participate in remote learning programs. Most districts are not grading students' assignments, either.

The extended school shutdowns have left "very little opportunity for our students to finish-out in any meaningful way," said Sara Morrison, executive director of the state board.

Before the governor's announcement, schools were to remain closed through at least April 24. But on Monday, Lee extended his statewide stay-at-home order through the remainder of April, and several school districts revised their closures until then or longer.
